Basic function definition in class I'm beginning to learn Python/Django and have a question which I'm not entirely sure is exactly a duplicate (hence the original question when I find the answer). I have a helper class named Global defined as follows: class Global: app = {}
@staticmethod def get_current_site(): return current_site As I understand it, the @staticmethod statements make this available for my class definitions without explicitly exporting it to the namespace. Is that correct? However, I'm struggling to understand how I can instantiate and call the initialize_app() method without a) creating an object of Global; b) calling Global.initialize_app() c) Creating a global variable of type Global to refer to it? Is there a better way to do this? A: I'm beginning to learn Python/Django and have a question which I'm not entirely sure is exactly a duplicate No, it's not a duplicate. I have a helper class named Global defined as follows: This is fine. app = {} You don't need this line. current_site = " This line is also not needed. @staticmethod def initialize_app(): Don't use the @staticmethod decorator here.
app['request'] = Request(request) app['current_site'] = site app['get_site'] = get_site Here you use one of the class variables for app: Why do you store request in your app? It is not defined anywhere and it is not an attribute of Global. It is a class attribute of Request. Only request
